Freeday — Recruitment

Re: Forward Deployed Engineer — Rotterdam

Tilburg, 19 August 2026

"Sits right between our clients and our product team" is a description of the last year of my life. At Netvice, a contact centre in Tilburg, nobody wrote me requirements: I sat with agents and floor managers, worked out where the process actually broke, and then built the thing that fixed it. That became a real-time operations layer wired to telephony webhooks, a daily planner the floor ran on, and a forecasting model that turns planned volume into the exact staffing needed on any future day. Every one of them started as my own proposal and ended up in production use — which is the only test that counts.

The integration half of your role is where I am most at home. My own SaaS, Citania, is a multi-tenant booking and payments platform I built alone — roughly 80,000 lines of production TypeScript on PostgreSQL, 294 automated tests, contract-first OpenAPI/Zod, and live integrations with Stripe, two-way Google Calendar and Microsoft Graph sync, inbound WhatsApp and OpenAI. Connecting a product to whatever system a client happens to run, then making the result reliable rather than merely working, is the part I enjoy most.

On (Gen)AI specifically: agentic tooling is how I deliver — I build with Claude Code daily, and prompt design, iteration and checking whether the output actually holds up are routine work rather than novelty. I have not run RPA platforms in production, and I would be learning your product's building blocks from scratch; what I bring instead is a strong record of getting productive in an unfamiliar stack fast, alone.

Practical notes, plainly: one year of professional experience; working language English, Dutch at A2 and improving; and I am a non-EU national on a Dutch highly-skilled-migrant permit, so Freeday B.V. — a recognised IND sponsor — would need to take over the sponsorship. Rotterdam is a straightforward commute, and an office-first team suits me. Everything I have described is live and clickable at franciscorau.com.
