Creative Clicks — Recruitment

Re: Product Owner — Conversion & Analytics (Amsterdam)

Tilburg, 19 August 2026

Your ad says this is not a generic backlog role — that the person should know how every landing page performs and whether the sale reporting funnel is telling the truth. That second half is what convinced me to write. At Netvice I owned the operational reporting environment, and a large part of that job was guarding whether the numbers were real: reconciling telephony and CRM sources that disagreed, defining KPIs precisely enough that teams stopped arguing about them, and building the dashboards people then steered by. Data-flow integrity is not an afterthought for me; it was most of the work.

On technical literacy: I do code, which makes the translation part easier. My own SaaS, Citania, runs on PostgreSQL with contract-first API schemas and live integrations to Stripe, Google Calendar, Microsoft Graph and WhatsApp — so APIs, JSON payloads and how data moves between a site, a reporting tool and an ad platform are familiar territory rather than concepts I have read about. I have also run an end-to-end analysis of 10,605 businesses' online-booking adoption, which is conversion research in a different industry.

Where I am honest about the gap: I have not held the Product Owner title, and my Agile experience is as a builder inside sprints rather than as the person running refinements. What I have done repeatedly is sit between business needs and a development effort and decide what gets built next — at Netvice that was my own roadmap, defended to a founder. If you want someone who has run ceremonies for years, I am not that; if you want someone who will genuinely know why a page converts and whether the funnel data can be trusted, I am worth a conversation.

Practical notes: working language English, Dutch at A2 and improving; and I am a non-EU national on a Dutch highly-skilled-migrant permit, so Creative Clicks B.V. — a recognised IND sponsor — would need to take over the sponsorship. Amsterdam hybrid works well for me.
