Patagonia — Recruitment

Application — Product & Supply Chain Business Analyst (Amsterdam)

Tilburg, 10 August 2026

Your role asks for someone who translates business needs into user stories, specifications and process flows — and who can carry cross-functional initiatives from scope to adoption. I have done that loop end to end, with one difference that I think is an advantage: I also build. At a Dutch contact centre I mapped how the operation actually ran, wrote the requirements, and then shipped the systems myself — forecasting, performance analytics, real-time operational tooling used daily. And as founder of Citania, a production SaaS I built alone, every user story, spec and delivery decision was mine — which taught me what requirements look like when the person writing them has to live with them.

I will be straight about level: this reads as a role where I would be growing into the leadership aspects — advising senior stakeholders, owning an EMEA roadmap — rather than arriving with years of it. What I bring against that is speed, systems fluency, and total ownership instinct: I have never waited for a framework to exist before making something work. And Patagonia specifically: I build things meant to last, and working for a company whose entire identity is that principle is not a line for me — it is the reason this application exists.

Practicalities: based in NL, kennismigrant permit — Patagonia's Dutch entity is an IND-recognised sponsor, so hiring me is a free notification, no visa procedure. Everything I claim is live at franciscorau.com. Available immediately.
